Introduction

Perspectives on the Punjab's Most Meaningful Heirlooms

It is an honour for me, on behalf of the Smithsonian Institution and Sikh Heritage Project, to introduce this truly unique volume of new perspectives on the material and the intangible heritage of the Sikhs. This book's four authors have worked in a unique partnership that transcended their individual accomplishments: Bhaiyye Sikandar Singh is co-editor of the magazine Mohale. His position within the cultural life of the Punjabi gives him unprecedented access. His upbringing, training and interests give him a unique insight into the author's life he has tackled in this book.

Bhainsley Singh is deputy editor of the 131-year-old daily newspaper The Tribune, which is the largest circulated English newspaper in South India. A professional historian, scholar, and award-winning photographer, he is author of many books on Sikhism, including a well-known volume on the founder of the Sikh religion, Guru Nanak Dev.

Together, they worked on the same and combined their different kinds of expertise to write with profound authority and eloquence. As a result of this unique partnership, the general reader— even those readers with little knowledge of Sikh traditions— will surely feel the powerful appeal of being taken along the very same paths trodden by the founding Gurus of Sikhism. The immediacy and presence of history will be felt in a way that is not particularly common today, within the Sikh world or elsewhere, because of the distance from the Punjab and beyond, as well as the few, if any, other authors could have authentically describe.

As the authors note, many of the families who own the heirloom artifacts most directly associated with the earliest founders of the Sikh faith have made them available for publication here for the first time for school teachers and the public. It is a debt of gratitude to these families, to the authors and to the many others who have helped bring this book to you.
